

Graded October 19th, 2018

Grade: A

Short Answer- 4 Points/4

Essay Question (Making Point Clear)- 4 Points/4

Essay Question (Backing up the Point)- 3 Points/4

Short Answer

Japanese people change the way they talk depending on whether they are talking to someone who they meets for the first time. For example, they talk to someone who they meets for the first time about nothing but only exchange short greetings like "Hajimemasite.", which means, "Nice to meet you."

Wonderful job! Good explanation.

Remember that you are practicing communicating with people who may not know Japanese well.

Essay

I'd like American way of communication better than the Japanese way. I have two reasons.

The first reason is that we should give our own opinion clearly. Suppose we don't communicate what we mean to someone, ~~w~~We can't will not be able to reacted ~~on to~~ each other correctly. Besides, Even if someone's opinion conflicts with ~~the~~another's, it is possible for us to get along with each other.

Interesting point! Could you give specific examples?

The second reason I like the American way of communication better is because the American way of communication is widely used in many countries such as England, Australia, and so on. Being able to communicate with foreign people in the American way of communication, ~~we will let us~~can interact with them smoothly. This makes us more active than ~~what~~how we are now.

Very good point!

In conclusion, I like the American way of communication better than the Japanese way because it's marvelous for us to communicate with others clearly and ~~to~~ we would be able to make friends with many people in the world through active communication.

Excellent!